"IIMC stands out head and shoulders above other institutions that I have attended. Having spent a year with batchmates from developing countries and learning from a galaxy of resource persons and faculty members, I understood that communication is the most important tool for development"

CHALLENGES FOR ASPIRING JOURNALISTS

The greatest challenge to journalists will come from Artificial Intelligence. They must re-skill themselves

With a deluge of information, readers and viewers look for credibility. Journalists must develop new ways to tell stories, and build credibility to stand out in the expanding industry

A journalist must not just cater to what readers or viewers want but help them distinguish between mere information and knowledge. Journalism should be more educative in future dents can fit into any newsroom from the very first day at work.

Admission to IIMC is now conducted under the newly introduced Common University Entrance Test (CUET). Opting for the CUET has helped IIMC expand its network and get students from the remotest corners. Earlier, on its own, it could conduct entrances test only in a handful of centres. "Now the batches have become truly reflective of the diversity of India," says Prof. Govind Singh, dean.

However, students' grip over language has been a serious concern for IIMC authorities. The CUET model doesn't leave much scope to examine students' language and storytelling skills. The lack of focus on language pedagogy in school education also makes matters difficult for IIMC professors. "I'm saying this with great responsibility. The kind of schooling that is happening, students are not learning languages well. Even teachers and parents are not paying attention. In communication, language is the primary tool. We can train students but cannot bridge the gap in language learning in our nine-month-long course. We hope the implementation of the National Education Policy will fix this crisis," says Prof. Dwivedi. The institute is now contemplating adding a new layer of test for those who clear the CUET to assess their language skills. ■
