During the pandemic, just like in other disciplines, students learnt through online classes streamed from classroom-kitchens. Post pandemic, students revisited the basics of cookery in kitchens on campus. This could be anything from cutting vegetables to preparation of different types of mother sauces—the base of continental cuisines. "The practical exposure helped students hone their skills, carry out the cookery practical and understand the science of cookery with hands-on and hand-held methodology," says Kamal Kant Pant, principal, IHM Pusa. In fact, the first four weeks after the return to classes went to ensure that gaps in skills due to Covid were minimised by special efforts from the faculty, often through the use of simulation techniques. These steps ensured to instil confidence and made students placement-ready. In the housekeeping and F&B departments too, topics covered over online classes were conducted all over again on campus. Like flower arrangement classes, say, or practising the organisation of various styles of service, like buffet and silver service.

The bachelor's in hotel and hospitality administration, the flagship programme at IHM Pusa, is most in demand with students, followed by the diploma programmes in bakery and confectionery, and food production. Says Pant, "The practical courses at IHM Pusa immerse students in the best of the five-star hospitality environments where they learn from industry-awarded professionals." Along with the regular curriculum, IHM makes it a point to provide students with additional industry inputs through workshops, field visits and guest lectures.

High industry exposure has helped IHM Pusa students win global competitions. For example,
