Health programme, the TISS library, which provides quick access to papers for research and other study material, and the active counselling centre that addresses students' concerns, are valuable complements to the academic curriculum. "In the peer support programme, first-year students are taught how to handle stress and counselling skills," she says. For Sarthak Banerjeepuri, whose parents are TISS alumni, the Covid-19 pandemic experience pushed him to follow in their footsteps. Banerjeepuri especially appreciates the free-flowing student-teacher relationship, which often translates into the two groups seen conversing at the same chai tapri [tea stall] outside the campus. "You can approach them with whatever your needs are, and [they are] reciprocated," he says. "It has only motivated me to do more." Adds Varier, "There is no hierarchy. The door is actually open for all." In the last academic year, SoSW

"My childhood was shaped by TISS given my mom was a TISSian, first as student and then teacher, much like myself. She, along with Armaity Desai, erstwhile director of TISS, taught me that you always put the community you work with at the centre and shape everything around what they need. It's what makes TISS unique"
