If there's one aspect, therefore, where TISS stands tall, it is the diversity on campus. The institute has strived to not only welcome students from all walks of life but also make their experience enriching. "It is a microcosm of India," says Jojo. Students from "rich, poor, rural, urban, different castes, classes, sexual and gender orientations can feel, share and talk", he notes.

Field-work, constituting 30 per cent of course credits, continues to be at the heart of the social work programme. It involves students spending 900 hours on the field—which aligns with international standards—spread across the two-year course, during which they work with a wide spectrum of organisations from orphanages and adoption centres to NGOs, and even police stations. It's what both students Shital Gamre and Manisha Ramdasmagar appreciate the most. "Getting to navigate theory on the field is great," they say. "Every week, we meet with the field supervisor to discuss our experience and what we are learning." The continued engagement TISS has with government agencies and departments, non-governmental organisations and corporates further ensures that students get suitable placements. The institute also continues to expand its 16 field action projects, which include the Child and Adolescent Guidance Centre, Resource Centre for Interventions on Violence Against Women, and Towards Advocacy, Networking and Developmental Action (TANDA), to name a few. ■
