A VISUAL HISTORY

The Photography Centre at London's V&A Museum opened in end-May with photographs from the early days of photography to work by Gauri Gill documenting the farmers' protests

In the 48 images from Gauri Gill's work, you see a human figure in only one frame. All the other photographs are of the structures put up by the farmers

PHOTOGRAPHY

The Wide Angle

Photographer Amit Pasricha's panoramic images, on view in Berlin currently, capture the very essence of India

Panoramas are to photography what stretch limousines are to cars...the luxury of excess space. These are multiple images shot on the same axis and digitally stitched together to create extended photographs that cover a wider expanse of visual information. Panoramic photography has conventionally just been a limo—a vehicle for special occasions. It is used to capture sweeping landscapes, show off grand monuments, or create dramatic images for gatefolds in coffee-table books.

Amit Pasricha, a scion of Delhi's first family of photographers, is arguably India's best-known practitioner of panoramic photography. He has amplified the clichéd strip of the panorama with the emotions and empathy of documentary photography, the palpable energy of street photography and the performative tableau of studio work. His panoramas create a sensory experience where the familiar scene is processed to stimulate a different way of seeing. One that evokes the throb of a fleeting emotion in the timelessness of a sweeping landscape.

An exhibition of Amit Pasricha's photographs shot over the last two decades, titled

Earth, Water, Air, Life—Managing Hope, is on at the Under The Mango Tree gallery in Berlin till July 12. The works are replete with the lived-in experience of India, captured in all its spatial, emotional and cultural quintessence. There are streetscapes where the turbulent activity of a scene is silenced into the hum
